BIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

Imagine what life was like for a young woman named Jenny Young Chandler, who in 1890 embarked on a career as a photojournalist. She was born in 1865 and married in 1888 at the age of 22. Chandler lived in Brooklyn, New York, where transportation consisted of walking, taking streetcars or riding in horse-drawn carriages. A mix of gas lamps and early electrical systems lit city streets and homes. Photographs were made by lugging a heavy camera, glass plate negatives and tripod.

Understanding how the photo chemicals worked and how light and camera lenses interacted proved to be an exacting task. While photography was growing in popularity as a hobby for young women whose families could afford the equipment, as a profession, it was still considered a male domain. Yet Jenny Chandler mastered the technical details of camera and chemicals, then used her sensitivity and insight as a professional photojournalist to capture life in turn-of-the-20th century Brooklyn and vicinity.

Chandler was born Jennie Randolph Young on September 3, 18651 in New Jersey to William Young and Mary Lewis Young2. An only child3, Jennie was raised by her father and stepmother, Sarah4 Bennett Young. The family moved to Brooklyn, New York, when Jennie was six, so her father could work as the city editor for the New York Sun5 newspaper. Jennie followed the normal “career path” for a young lady at that time, marrying William Goodnow Chandler on April 25, 18886. The groom, a neighbor, worked as a sales representative for a picture frame manufacturer. The newlyweds took up residence at 18 Hart Street in Brooklyn, where7 8 they welcomed a son, whom they named William Young Chandler, born October 12, 18909. But then the unexpected happened–Jennie’s husband died December 10, 1890 of typhoid fever, leaving her a young widow with a two-month old baby.

Chandler began to earn a living for herself and child by taking photographs and writing special feature10 articles for the New York Herald newspaper. She also wrote and illustrated articles for women’s magazines, beginning to spell her first name “Jenny.” In 1913, she and her 23-year-old son moved to a smaller townhouse in Brooklyn at 265 Washington Ave. An article Chandler wrote that same year for the November issue of The House Beautiful offers us a rare glimpse into the journalist’s home life. While presenting ideas about the merits of using the simpler lines of Colonial-style furnishings to her readers, she wrote:

“Being obliged to convert the room usually selected for this [family dining] purpose into an office for the professional member of the family, and the house not being blessed with an extension, we were denied this boon when we moved into our present home last spring. ‘I fear it’s the basement for ourselves,’ gloomily exclaimed the son of the house, who had his eye on the front ground floor apartment for a billiard-room, when we came to discuss the question of the dining-room…The heavy oak furniture, which had given an air of elegance and style to the oak-paneled and tapestry-covered walls of the suburban house from which we had come, made a caricature of the room;”

In 1922 at the age of 56, Jenny Young Chandler died of a heart ailment, leaving a photographic legacy of over 800 glass plate negatives in her home on Washington Avenue. Ten years later, Betty R. K. Pierce, the subsequent owner of the house, contacted Henry Ford, hoping “to have Mrs. Chandler’s work preserved in some way.” Mrs. Pierce had read about Henry Ford’s museum and historical village, and thought the photographs particularly related to Mr. Ford’s collections: “The negatives of Antiques are from many private collections, Andirons, Bead Bags, Furniture, interiors of old houses with their antique furniture, old Wooden Indians, old Money, Miniatures, ivories, glass, etc, etc. Then there are hundreds of street scenes, shore, dry dock, Prospect Park - Children - Wow!” J.A. Humberstone of Henry Ford’s staff immediately answered Mrs. Pierce stating that these glass negatives were indeed worth preserving. He arranged for the five large boxes to be shipped from New York to Michigan in 1932.

The result of this donation is an amazing document of early 20th century life. Nearly 800 glass plate negatives exist in sizes ranging from 4x5 inches to 6x9 inches with the photographer’s identifying notes on the negative envelopes. Jenny Chandler’s photographs have an immediacy—a “you are there” quality. She possessed sensitivity to “all walks of life” and documented diverse economic levels and ethnic backgrounds. For example, she photographed the gamut of life from well-off Brooklyn girls and boys playing games, school groups visiting museums and families enjoying the beach at Coney Island to scruffy boys hanging out at the beach, orphan girls sewing and children gathering tomatoes to a fisherman mending his net, shipwrights working on wooden boats and Norwegian immigrant women doing farm work.

Because no personal correspondence or published works accompanied the glass negatives, much research was undertaken by dedicated interns over a number of years. As often happens with historical research, much more research awaits us. In the meantime, modern digital images made from the glass plate negatives allow today’s researchers to study the work of this remarkable woman photojournalist.

SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE

The Jenny Young Chandler photographs consist of several hundred photographic prints and nearly 800 glass plate photographic negatives ranging from 4x5 inches to 6x9 inches. The photographs are arranged into the following series: Photographic Prints (1.6 cubic ft.), 4x5 Glass Plate Negatives (0.4 cubic ft.), 5x7 Glass Plate Negatives (3.2 cubic ft.) and 6x9 Glass Plate Negatives (2.0 cubic ft.) Each series is organized alphabetically by subject, based on Chandler's original topics. Within the photographic prints series a Realia subseries contains a selection of the original cardboard boxes that housed the negatives. In addition, throughout the glass plate negatives series many original negative envelopes exist. These envelopes have Jenny Young Chandler’s handwritten identifying notes regarding the topics and descriptions of the images. Archives staff assigned identification numbers to each glass plate negative during processing. Images depict people from all walks of life, the decorative arts, streetscapes and waterscapes, etc.

ARRANGEMENT

The collection is arranged in four series:

1) Photographic Prints (1.6 cubic ft.)
   1a) Realia
2) 4x5 Glass Plate Negatives (0.4 cubic ft.)
3) 5x7 Glass Plate Negatives (3.2 cubic ft.)
4) 6x9 Glass Plate Negatives (2.0 cubic ft.)
